The Dial Sheet

The home-services cold call. One aim only – the 25-minute build review, booked inside 48 hours. Beats to internalize, not a monologue to read. Most of the call is them talking.

The bearing

We do not sell; we serve. The call is 70 percent them. Ask the question, then go quiet – the silence carries the weight. Contractions fall naturally when spoken; these written beats are the spine, not the sound. The calm is the credibility, and they buy your certainty before your offer. There are hundreds of names behind this one, so nothing here needs to work on any single dial.

01 THE OPENER honest, permission, ten seconds

“Hi [First Name], Martavious Spicer, Five Points Digital Studio here in Atlanta. Straight with you – this is a cold call. I am not selling anything today. I have one question about how you are handling calls this season, and if it is not useful you can hang up on me guilt-free. Fair?”

02 SHOW THEM YOU KNOW THEM pick the trade, then hand over the floor

HVAC

“It is late July. I would bet this is the busiest fortnight of your year – and my question is about the calls that come in while every tech you have is on a rooftop. When a homeowner in Sandy Springs calls at 7pm and gets voicemail, where does that job actually go?”

ELECTRICIAN

“You are likely on a ladder more than you are near a phone. When someone in Buckhead calls three electricians in a row, the job goes to whoever answers first. How many of those do you reckon ring through to you and die in voicemail?”

ROOFER

“One roof in Alpharetta is a $15,000 to $30,000 ticket. So one missed call is not a missed call – it is a mortgage payment. How fast does your team get back to an enquiry that comes in after hours?”

REMODELER

“Your jobs are $80,000 kitchens and six-figure builds – you do not need volume, you need the right handful of enquiries a year. When someone in Milton fills in your estimate form on a Sunday night, how long before a human gets back to them? Because they filled in three other forms the same evening, and the first credible answer wins the walkthrough.”

Then stop. Let them answer. This is the call.

Cost, bridge, close

03 THE COST their number, never yours

“So over a month of season like this one – what do you reckon that adds up to? Rough number.”

Silence. Whatever figure they say is the thing that books the meeting. Do not improve on it. Their number, in their words, moves them – yours would not.

04 THE BRIDGE the value equation in one breath

“Here is why I called you specifically and not the franchise down the road. I build the system that answers, books and follows up on every one of those calls automatically – I just built one for an electrical firm serving Buckhead and Milton. I am not asking you to buy anything. I want 25 minutes on a screen where I show you exactly what I would build for [Company] – your numbers, your service area, what working together would actually look like. If it makes sense, we talk about moving forward. If it does not, you keep the ideas and I have wasted nobody’s time.”

The electrical-firm line is the sharpest asset on this sheet – true, local and recent. Use it on every call.

05 THE CLOSE two doors inside 48 hours, then quiet

“I hold two build-review slots this week. I have tomorrow at [time] or Thursday at [time] – which suits you better?”

Book it. Confirm the email on the phone and send the invite before you hang up. If both times fail, they name one inside the week – never “next month.”

06 VOICEMAIL under 20 seconds, text immediately after

“[First Name], Martavious Spicer, Five Points in Atlanta. Calling about the jobs going to voicemail during your busiest season – I build the system that catches them, just finished one for an Atlanta electrical firm. Worth 25 minutes to see what it would look like for [Company]. 470-556-3989 – I will text you as well.”

Owners in the trades answer texts, not voicemails. The text goes out the same minute.

Objections

“Not interested.”

“Fair – you do not know me. One thing before I go: is it that your phones are genuinely handled, or that this is a bad moment? Because if a single $[their number] month is leaking, 25 minutes finds it.”

“Send me something.”

“A PDF tells you about me – the 25 minutes is about you. Let me hold Thursday, and cancel after you have seen the invite if you want.”

“Too busy.”

“That is rather the point – busy season is when the leak is biggest. Twenty-five minutes, nothing to prepare, I do all the talking with your numbers on screen.”

“How much?”

“Depends entirely on what is worth building, and I will not guess before I have looked. Everything I show Thursday is yours either way. Entry work starts under two grand – nobody needs a board meeting for that.”

“All our work comes from referrals.”

“Good – that means the work speaks for itself, and I would not touch that. My question is what happens in the months the referrals go quiet. The 25 minutes shows what a second, owned channel looks like sitting alongside the referral flow – not replacing it.”

The take-away. If it is still no after the close, leave clean: “Understood, no problem at all. If the timing ever changes, the 25 minutes stands.” Never a third ask. The composure on the way out is what reopens the door later.

THE DNA

Hormozi carries the structure – dream outcome high, risk and effort near zero, which is why the ask is 25 minutes with everything kept either way. Robbins is in the delivery, not the words – beat 04 is spoken like the build already exists. Gadzhi is beat 04 itself: never pitch the service, pitch the personalized look at their business. Chris Do gives beats 02 and 03 – lead with questions, let the client price the problem before you ever price the solution. Godin is the opener – permission asked, never taken. Vaynerchuk is the math around the whole sheet: value given before anything is asked, and volume without attachment.
